

An historical and descriptive account of the coasts of Sussex

This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1833 Excerpt: ... one occasion a Dutch vessel was thus guided with its prow right into the cave, by which twelve, or as some say twenty, lives were saved. Tradition has stated, that the poor mans home was made insupportable by a termagant wife, and some have added that she was too fond of her cups. If so, he hit on the very wisest, as well as most noble and generous method of alleviating his own misfortunes, by the pleasure derived from relieving the distresses of others. The view from the summit of Beachy Head has an air of solitary and sublime grandeur; the keen and ethereal air of this exalted spot would seem almost capable, with the permission of the presiding and conservative spirit, of restoring vigour to the dying. The height is not so much perceived by the spectator, from contemplating the straight or waving snowy wall of cliff, as by listening to the distant and indistinct murmur of the waves, and looking down upon the thread-like outline of their foaming edges, as they break upon the shore; which, to use the only illustration we can find applicable, look like the trifling froth of a puddle, after the most moderate shower. We need scarcely refer our readers for an exactly suitable idea of the whole scene to the description by the immortal Shakspeare, of the precipitous cliffs of Dover. On one of the extreme heights is a Signal Station, with a flag-staff, and two or three guns. Farther on, to the right, is the Light-house, on a projecting neck of land, of lower elevation, but greater prominence, and therefore capable of being seen at a much greater distance by mariners, when coming within reach of the dangerous shore. It has been erected of late years 1-, though seemingly called for long before; and has,
