

Memoirs of the Life, Character, and Labours of the Rev. John Smith, Late of Sheffield (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Memoirs of the Life, Character, and Labours of the Rev. John Smith, Late of Sheffield

In conducting a lovefeast in Carver-street chapel, Sheffield, several years ago, the author heard a deep-toned but tremulous voice exclaim, I am the father of John Smith; I have been to visit the grave of my son. These exclamations, with others accompanied by deep emotions, produced a thrilling effect through the assembly. The good father gave expression to the thankfulness of his heart that God had given him such a son; and was wrought up to ecstasy at the thought of meeting him in heaven. That meeting has long since taken place. The son, first in glory, has hailed his sire, not at a meeting in which one was prostrate in the grave, and the other a mourner by its side, but in living and blissful companionship. All the links, however, are not broken which connect the name of John Smith with earth. The father has been removed; but the widow and children remain. Such a family is an interesting spectacle. It has some claim upon the regard of the living world. A hero who dies in the field of battle not only leaves the example of his noble deeds, as a legacy to his country, but also those who bear his name. The church has its spiritual heroes, its lights, its martyrs. The subject of these Memoirs died a young man through his excessive labours: have not his family a right to affectionate remembrance, - and something else? The fact that the Life of John Smith has already passed through seven [eight] editions, shows that he has not been forgotten. Many thousands have derived edification by its perusal; some, it is hoped, have been brought to God. The piety, labours, and talents of the dead become the stock of the living church. Their example and spirit, when rescued from oblivion, constitute a seed of piety to succeeding generations. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes
